Is WeChat a weapon of social control for China?

China's WeChat is a site for social interaction, a form of currency, a dating app, a tool for sporting teams and deliverer of news: Twitter, Facebook, Googlemaps, Tinder and Apple Pay all rolled into one. But it is also an ever more powerful weapon of social control for the Chinese government.

Is WeChat an example of a non-Western Digital Media Service?

Through the case study of the Chinese social media application, WeChat, we argue that WeChat is an example of a non-Western digital media service that owes its success first to its platformization and then to the infrastructuralization of its platform model.

Is WeChat a platform or an infrastructure?

Drawing on the results of the analysis of technical documentation, business reports, as well as observations and interviews, we first present WeChat as both a platform and an infrastructure, and then we contextualize WeChat in the history of ICT infrastructure and the development of the internet in China.

Is the WeChat platform model shaped by techno-nationalist media regulations?

Moreover, our findings show that the infrastructuralization of the WeChat platform model in China is shaped by markedly techno-nationalist media regulations and an increasingly overt cyber-sovereignty agenda.

Will WeChat be a success with Twitter?

He has previously praised WeChat - a so-called "everything app" that combines chat, dating, payments and social media - and has said creating something "even close to that with Twitter... would be an immense success".

How does WeChat work in China?

It started as a messaging platform like WhatsApp or iMessage, and its two most-used features are the WhatsApp-like "Chats" and "Moments", which is similar to Facebook. Its widely-used "Wallet" feature can be linked to debit and credit cards - most shops and online retailers in China accept WeChat payments, with users scanning QR codes to pay.
